I absolutely loved this book! By Michael A. Hughes I read this book some time ago and LOVED it! At the time I wasn't much into non-fiction, but I loved the small size of the chapters and how I could read about one experience and process it as it was....each chapter stands alone. I was amazed by the tales I read, and many of the images have stayed with me. So much so, that now I am getting ready to teach an Oregon History class to a homeschool group and seeking out this book specifically. I have recommended it to many of my friends as well. The stories are various, a native princess being helped by her tribe to overcome her fear of water, the Whitman massacre, young brides marrying because of the additional land claim availability, journeying over the foothills of Mt. Hood with cattle, visiting Seattle in the late 1800's or early 1900's, a cabin in the woods....etc. 5 of 6 people found the following review helpful. Synopsis By Knowledge Contagion I checked this book out from the library and didn't get around to reading it. I'm "reviewing" this anyway because it bugs me when there is absolutely nothing on the product description page that tells me what the book is about. So here it is, straight from the jacket flaps: "A new view of western history is emerging, one that recognizes the experiences and contributions of all peoples who lived in or came to the American West. 'Pacific Northwest Women,' a remarkable collection of stories, essays, memoirs, letters, and poems, contributes to this new understanding and challenges many myths about women who lived and worked - and wrote - in the West. "This anthology gives voice and interpretation to the experiences of a diverse group of thirty women, all of whom lived in Oregon and Washington. The editors, in addition to asking how race, class, and gender affected these women's experiences, examine what role this particular geographic region played in shaping their lives." The selections, some of which have never before been presented to contemporary readers, are arranged according to four themes: connecting with nature, coping with circumstances, caregiving to others, and communicating for the self and others. In addition to providing biographical information on each author, the editors also explore the modern-day concept of empowerment in the experiences of these women."
